In Art, performance and social poetics: contemporary Japanese perspectives we consider the interrelationship of artistic practices with community events, cultural activism and people's experiences of everyday life in Japan. How are these experiences represented in the arts and what are the places, people and problems that are motivating artists? Is there evidence for a social poetics that productively rethinks politics in Japan and meaningfully connects artistic practices with communities? What are the aesthetic and dramaturgical strategies that have been emerging in Japan over the last decade?
